Cal EOC Incident – 2014 Drought

- SOC / Inland REOC remains activated in support of 2014 Drought

WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

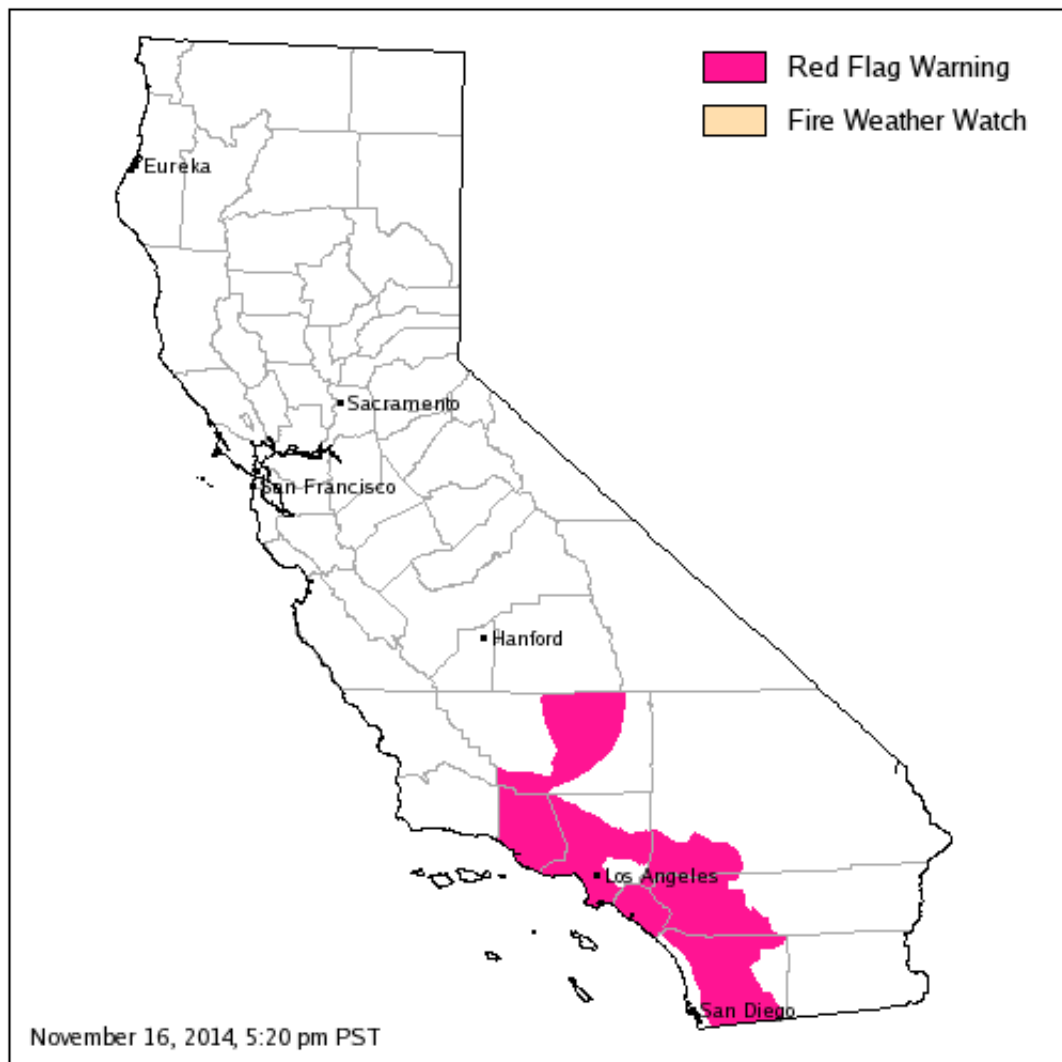

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Breezy north winds and drying today as high pressure builds along the West Coast. The breezy north to east winds will decrease slowly tonight and Monday but afternoon minimum humidity will remain in the teens and 20s. Moisture will increase slightly on Tuesday as a more onshore flow develops ahead of a Pacific weather system forecast to move onshore around Wednesday. All Northern California areas can expect a threat of precipitation on Wednesday as this system moves onshore. The rest of the week looks quite moist as more weather systems push inland.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

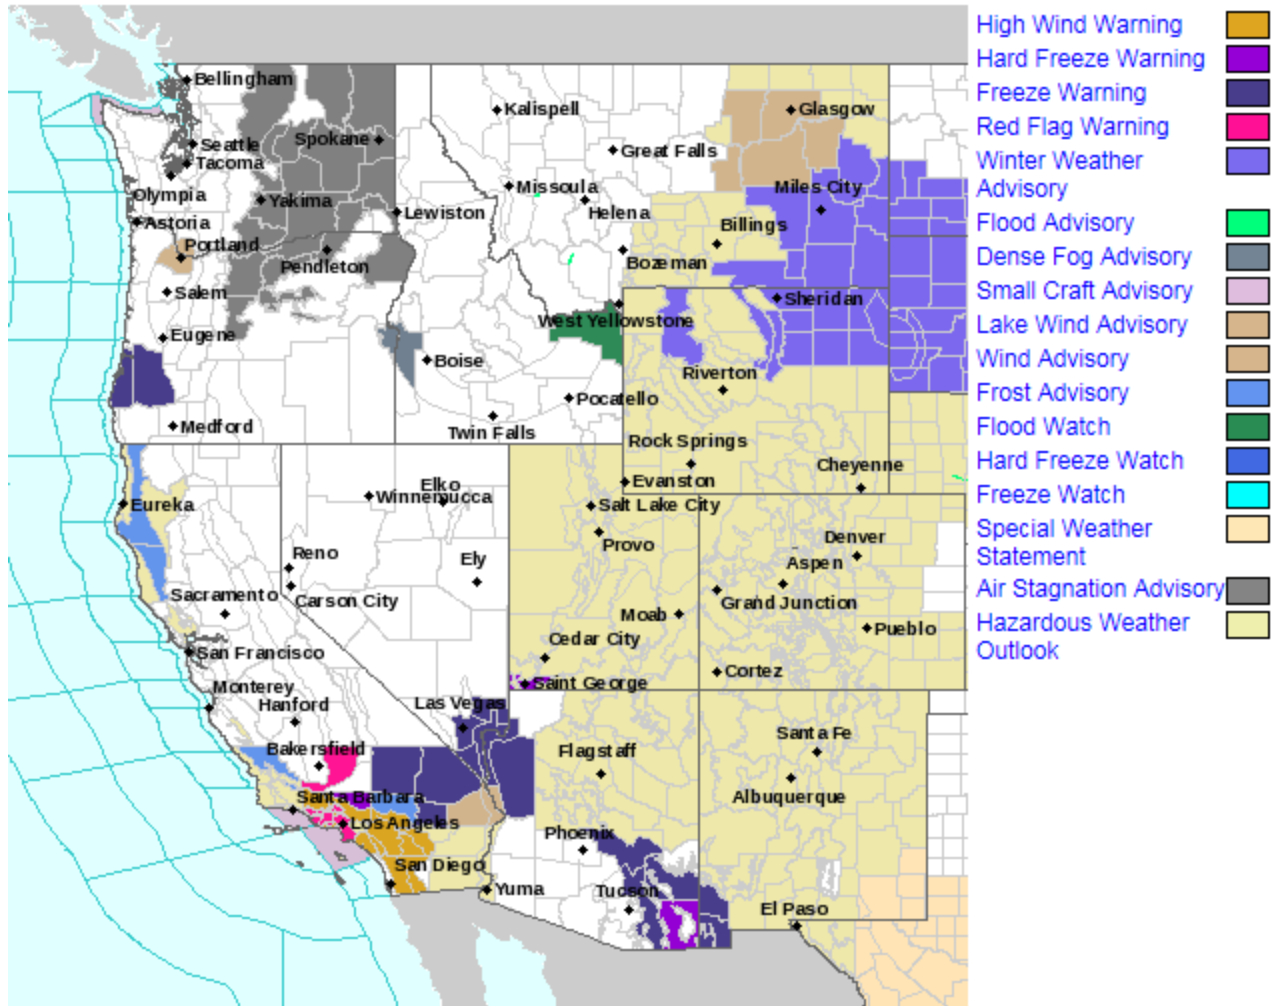

Cold air filtering into the desert will generate a strong offshore pressure gradient through Monday. Wind gusts over 50 mph have already developed before daybreak and winds are expected to increase and spread to most areas west of the mountains later this morning. In general, sustained east and northeast winds of 25-35 mph will be common over many passes and canyons from Kern County southward throughout the day. The strongest winds today may occur over portions of Orange County, Ventura County, and northern Los Angeles County where some gusts to 70 mph will be possible. Minimum relative humidity will quickly tumble into the single digits by afternoon. A high risk day is in effect due to gusty winds, low relative humidity and very dry fuels. Temperatures today will be slightly warmer west of the mountains, but due to the continued offshore winds and high pressure building into the area; high temperatures will likely reach the 80s by Monday and Tuesday. The winds should gradually decrease late Monday night, becoming light by Tuesday. Minimum relative humidity recovery will be very poor tonight and again Monday night. Later this week, a pair of weak troughs may bring some light rain to Central California from Monterey and Fresno Counties northward. The rest of the district will see temperatures return to near normal by Wednesday with much higher relative humidity overspreading the region. No significant rain is expected over Southern California during the next 10 days.
